FWIS 105: McAdams (Fall 2020)

That is, Hellenism is not a concept, nor is it a substantive thing. It is a relation between a particular past, itself differentially imagined over time and therefore not very particular at all, and an ever-changing present, which is to say, the succession of modernities that emerge and then retreat from one historical conjuncture to the next.

General to Specific

What is more, the mere succession of moments along the chain is sufficient in itself either to subvert each new to claim to a definitive hold on the past, or else to require suppression and forgetting for any given present to deal coherently with its relation to Greece.

In effect, Hellenism names the ethnic and cultural identity of Greekness, an identity that can be expressed in 'common bloodlines, common language, altars to the gods and sacrifices shared in common and common mores and habits...

Plainly, the idea of Greece as a symptom of Hellenism and classicism is not your garden-variety fantasy, but one that has been multiplied and compounded by centuries and even millennia of overlaid reception.

F. A. Wolf, for example, recognized in the Hellenistic scholars the modern philologist's, and his own, kith and kin. And the same analogy is already found in Wolf's teacher, C. G. Heyne, in his own study of the age of the Ptolemies.

No less significantly, Droysen's vision of Hellenism as 'a mirror of the present,' his projection of the (Prussian) present onto the antique past, helped to codify and legitimize a tendency that was in evidence before him but which now became more or less explicit

It may be that the past can be understood in no other way. The extent of this identification can, however, be unconscious, or simply disavowed
